Harry Johnson helped develop and manage Government programs during the volatile 70's. His personal experiences range from energy agency disagreements about the regulation of natural gas, friendly and not so friendly testimony before Congress and a briefing on energy to the President of the United States. The insider information discussed in the Journey shows how energy programs were developed by the government, what worked and what did not work. The past successes and failures discussed in the Journey provide a useful framework to gauge the effectiveness of future government energy programs.
