2,000 to 10,000 How to write faster, write better, and write more of what you love. This handy little book instructs and informs about how to write more. If you are serious about being an author you need to address this as a profession. She builds it on a triangle. 1st plot or outline. If you know where you are going then you know where you will write. This cuts out dead ends and strange meanderings. The second leg of the triangle is record your time. By keeping records of how much work you do you can track your efficiency. The third leg is enthusiasm, if you are looking forward to the scene and your task for the day you will naturally fall into the flow. With so many books out on the market and the boom of self publishing you must embrace the old notion. Publish or perish. I am an avid user of the pomodoro technique to track my writing and the amount of time I spend revising, writing, outlining, or proof reading. This has allowed me to get a whole lot more work done. I give this little book 4 stars. It is chock full of information and handy tips. The writer leads you to believe that you can indeed write 10k words a day, and have them be the best words you can write.

Not sure why some people are losing their minds over this book. I suppose all writers want a magic feather, and the title certainly promises that. The reality isn't quite so. Rachel has even said on podcasts that she isn't constantly mega-productive. She doesn't write 10K/day every day. You could just read her blogs and get the exact same information for free. There was a little more contextual stuff included in the book but I read it in a couple hours and I knew full well that I'd read this all in her blog posts long ago. I basically paid to be reminded of things that I already knew. Then again, Rachel took the time to write the blog posts and get an audiobook made of them, so I didn't ask for a refund. That's the nice part, is that she doesn't charge much to read this collection of blog posts. Basically, if you plot out your entire story in advance, and it's so good that you're really excited to write it, you can increase your output. If you're a committed pantsier, well, you just keep on keepin' on.

Very helpful book with a lot of good examples. It's one of those books that you sit down with a notepad and make a list of things you want to do yourself. I would think that this method would work for any type of writing, from fiction to biographical. You'd have to read the whole book to get the ideas, since she starts out by talking about fiction. However, with biographical info, for example, you already a few steps completed and then go from there. Very helpful info that would apply to any writing, except perhaps technical writing, although I'd think that would be adaptable, having written some computer manuals myself. I don't understand those who are criticizing this for applying only to fiction writing, except to assume they quit reading when they hit the word fiction.

I write non-fiction books. It's all I've ever written (except a little bit of poetry and some short stories). But I was seriously considering writing a novel and so I decided to do some research. That's when I came across this book. So far, I've read 12 books on novel and fiction writing. Out of all the books I've read, this is BY FAR the best (and for only 99cents, it put all those other books to shame). What the author shares about planning your writing ahead, planning your plot, and the simple process she uses is worth the price of all the books I bought and then some. Sometimes, the simplest ideas can have the biggest impact on your life. The book is also full of other useful ideas and tips such as planning your editing ahead of time, proactively solving problems upfront through good planning rather than once you've wasted a lot of time writing a story that doesn't work and a lot more. One thing that really stuck with me from this book is that you should only write what you love to write. If there's a word, a scene, a chapter or even a whole book you don't enjoy writing then stop! Throw it out (or just put it aside) and go work on writing something you love to write. Life's too short to spend time writing something you don't enjoy doing. This book inspired me to start my first novel. I mapped out the whole plot and the scenes as the author suggested and by the time I was done, I had tears in my eye because I was so touched by the story I had created in less than an hour using this process. I can't tell you how grateful I am for this book! It's not just great for fiction writers either! I've already started using some of these strategies for my non-fiction books and have noticed dramatic improvements in my writing speed, clarity and quality of my work because I'm even more excited about writing now. If you're serious about writing or even considering it as a career or part-time work, you owe it to yourself to read this book!
